

Survivor Story: Steve Fisher
Tualatin Valley Fire & Rescue, Engineer
Diagnosed with Testicular Cancer in 2009

"No one should go through this by themselves."

In 2009 when Steve Fisher began his battle with cancer, he knew that he never wanted a fellow firefighter to have to feel like they were alone in their fight. Steve was diagnosed with Testicular Cancer in 2009 before he knew about Firefighter Cancer Support Network. It was not until after his battle with cancer that he was introduced to FCSN.

Steve began to fight back against firefighter occupational cancer in a big way. He began to research and reach out to organizations to learn more. Steve's cancer case was actually the first presumptive claim in the entire state of Oregon that was accepted. Steve didn't stop there he wanted to get involved in the cancer battle at the state level. He's been working with the state of Oregon on a Train the Trainer program and was also the FCSN Oregon State Director in 2010.

Steve is such an asset to our FCSN team and he continues to mentor those who have been diagnosed so they know they do not have to go through their fight alone. Our team of volunteers is amazing because of volunteers like Steve!
